

Betfair Data, Punters Clubs, and Exotic Betting Strategies in Australia

Introduction

Betting in Australia offers multiple avenues, from using modern exchanges like Betfair to traditional TAB outlets at the pub. Each approach has its own data sources and strategy considerations. In particular, Betfair's exchange provides rich data and trading opportunities, while punters clubs (group betting pools) often rely on exotic bets (like multis, trifectas, etc.) to chase big wins. In this comprehensive overview, we'll explore what data you can get from Betfair, how Betfair trading works, how it compares to placing bets through a TAB machine, and why exotic bets are seen as high-reward opportunities. We'll also discuss best practices for punters clubs and evaluate which strategies might be most effective for profit.

Data Available from Betfair

Betfair offers extensive data that punters can leverage for analysis and strategy. Through the Betfair API and historical data services, you can access detailed market information including odds fluctuations, volumes matched, and results. The official Betfair Historical Data service provides time-stamped market, price, and settlement data for exchange markets (available from around 2015 onward) ¹. This means you can obtain historical odds for each runner in a race or each outcome in a sports match, along with how much was traded at various price points. Such data is invaluable for backtesting betting strategies before risking real money ¹. For example, you could analyze how often favorites drift in price or how much money comes late into the market.

In real time, Betfair's API allows you to pull current market data. You can get the best back and lay prices available (with market depth up to 10 price levels), the total amounts waiting to be matched, and the amount already traded at each price ² ³. You can also retrieve the last traded price and the Betfair Starting Price (BSP) for each runner ⁴ ⁵. The BSP is an especially useful piece of data – it is an aggregate starting odd calculated by Betfair to be as fair as possible for backers and layers ⁶. Many analysts treat BSP as a benchmark of a horse's "true" odds because it reflects the collective wisdom of the exchange market at jump time. In short, Betfair can provide virtually all the data a punter or analyst would need: real-time odds with market depth, historical price movements, and settlement outcomes.

Having Betfair as the dataset means you can analyze past races or matches to identify patterns (for example, odds movements or trading volumes) and spot potential value bets. It's possible to purchase or download historical files for various sports and markets, and even filter for specific criteria ¹ ⁷. Third-party tools exist to convert Betfair's raw data (which might come in JSON or TAR format) into CSV for easier analysis ⁸. In summary, by tapping into Betfair's data, a punter gains a robust foundation for making informed decisions, whether the bets are ultimately placed on the exchange or elsewhere.

Betfair Trading as an Option

One advantage of Betfair over traditional betting channels is the ability to trade bets like one would trade stocks. Betfair is a betting exchange where you can both back (bet on something to happen) and lay (bet on something not to happen) outcomes ⁹ ¹⁰. This exchange model enables an entire style of betting known as Betfair trading, which is fundamentally different from simple “back-and-hope” punting. The idea behind Betfair trading is to capitalize on fluctuations in odds during the lead-up or in-play period of an event, locking in profits regardless of the final result ¹¹. In practice, a trader might back a horse at high odds earlier, then lay the same horse at lower odds just before the race (or vice versa), securing a profit from the difference in prices. As one guide explains, “prices constantly change on the exchange, which means you can guarantee a winning position by backing a selection at high odds, then laying it at low odds, or vice-versa.” ¹² In other words, if you predict an odds movement correctly, you can hedge your bet so that you win no matter what the outcome is. This could be as simple as back-to-lay (backing a horse then laying it at shorter odds after its price drops) or lay-to-back (laying a favorite early then backing it at longer odds if it drifts).

Betfair trading can be done pre-match (or pre-race) based on market trends, or even in-play for sports and racing events that allow live betting. For instance, in horse racing, some traders back horses known to lead early (“front-runners”) at decent odds before the race, then trade out (lay) at much shorter odds once the horse hits the front during the race – a tactic often called “dobbing” or back-to-lay ¹³ ¹⁴. Others may scalp small price movements by quickly backing and laying repeatedly for a few ticks difference. The key to successful trading is having discipline and a strategy; without that, one can incur substantial losses ¹⁵. It’s not a foolproof money machine – it requires skill in reading the market and sometimes very fast reactions (especially in volatile live markets).

The data from Betfair is crucial for trading: watching the market depth and money flow can indicate where odds might move. Sophisticated traders use software tools or API connections to track real-time odds and even automate trading. Strategies often revolve around patterns in the data – for example, noticing if a horse’s lay side is being heavily backed (indicating its odds might shorten). Betfair’s data can also help in analyzing past trades: you might backtest a trading strategy using historical price data to see if it would have been profitable over time. This quantitative approach is recommended – Betfair itself encourages users to backtest strategies with historical data before going live ¹⁶.

In short, the Betfair trading option offers a more dynamic way to bet. Instead of simply betting and waiting for the result, you actively manage your position. This can potentially yield more consistent, smaller profits by exploiting market inefficiencies, as opposed to the all-or-nothing outcome of a traditional bet. Many professional punters treat Betfair trading like financial trading, setting stop-loss limits and profit targets. However, it’s important to note that trading requires focus and usually online access to the exchange. If you’re at a pub or on the go, actively trading markets in real-time may not be practical, whereas placing a simple bet is. So while Betfair trading can be lucrative and data-driven, it may be something you do when you have dedicated screen time, as a complement to the more casual bets placed with friends at the pub.

Betting Through the TAB (Side Bets at the Pub)

Traditional betting via the TAB (Totalizator Agency Board, or the tote) is a different experience from Betfair exchange betting. If you're at an Australian pub with a TAB machine, you're likely placing pari-mutuel bets (where all stakes go into a pool and payouts are based on the shared pool after the house take) or fixed-odds bets offered by the TAB or a bookmaker. Placing bets through the TAB is convenient in social settings and allows access to bet types like exotics (trifectas, quinellas, etc.) that punters clubs love. However, it's important to recognize the differences in odds and value between TAB betting and Betfair.

Because the TAB (tote) takes a fixed percentage out of every pool (often 15-20% depending on the bet type), the odds at the tote can be poorer value on average than those on Betfair, which only charges commission on winnings. In fact, Betfair's exchange model with peer-to-peer betting and low commission often leads to better odds for the punter. As one Australian racing source notes, "Betfair regularly offers better odds than the best price available from the Australian TAB", cautioning that if you only bet with the TAB, *"you are losing money even when you win."*¹⁷ This was evidenced by examples like the Melbourne Cup, where a horse (e.g. Verry Elleegant) paid significantly higher on Betfair than on the TAB for the same win¹⁸. The reason is that bookmakers and totes build margin into the odds; Betfair doesn't set odds, it just matches backers and layers, so the prices often reflect a truer market with less margin. For instance, a horse might be $5.00 on the tote but $6.50 on Betfair – a savvy punter could use Betfair data to see this difference and either bet on Betfair for the higher payout or recognize that the tote odds are "unders."

That said, betting at the pub via a TAB terminal has its place. It's immediate and social – you can cheer with your mates as you watch the race live. Also, certain bet types like large exotic pools (e.g. the quaddie or big trifectas) are only available through the tote or bookmakers, not (or only limitedly) on the exchange. When you place an exotic bet on the TAB, your payout is the dividend determined by the pool, which can sometimes exceed what fixed odds would have been, especially if it's an unlikely result. For example, if you and your punters club jag a tricky trifecta at the pub, the dividend might be huge due to all the casual money in the pool that missed that combination. On major race days, trifecta and first-four pools swell with casual bettors' money, which creates an opportunity: *"On major races, like the Melbourne Cup... trifecta pools soar, pumped up by 'mug' money from people who have only one or two bets a year. These are the races where many professional punters take extensive multiples and clean up big dividends."*¹⁹ In other words, the tote pools can occasionally present overlay value for those who know what they're doing, precisely because the average pub punter bets randomly.

In terms of data usage, you can still leverage Betfair's information even if you place the bet through the TAB. Many serious punters will watch the Betfair exchange odds on their phone to gauge a horse's true chance, then place a bet on the tote if, say, the tote is paying higher than Betfair for a selection near jump time (a sign of a potential overlay). Conversely, if the tote price is much lower, it might indicate smart money has already driven it down, and Betfair (being more efficient) could warn you off a bad value bet. Also, the exchange can signal late changes (like a market mover horse) which might not be as obvious at the pub. So, while the bet execution might be manual through a TAB machine, the decision-making can be data-driven by Betfair.

In summary, Betfair vs TAB comes down to value and flexibility. Betfair offers better odds on most straight bets and the flexibility to trade or cash out, but requires a bit more tech-savvy and access. The TAB (especially in a pub setting) offers ease of use and access to all bet types (especially exotics), but you should be aware of the generally higher house edge. Many Australian punters use a hybrid approach: using Betfair when possible for the best odds on simple win/place bets or for trading, and using the TAB for exotic bets or when physically congregating with friends. By comparing the two, one can choose the option that offers the best expected value for each situation.

Punters Clubs: Group Betting and Its Challenges

A punters club is a group of people who pool their money to bet collectively, often turning betting into a social event. In Australia, punters clubs are common among friends, coworkers, or pub mates – for example, each member might contribute a set amount (weekly or monthly) and take turns deciding the bets, with any winnings returning to the pool. The appeal is sharing the thrill of the punt, spreading risk (no one person loses a huge amount individually), and hopefully hitting a big collect that can be celebrated together. However, the “punters club problem” refers to the challenges in making this setup successful and profitable. By nature, group betting introduces dynamics that can lead to poor decisions if not managed well.

One issue is lack of strategy or consistency: different members may have different betting styles. One week, one member might bet the whole pool on a long-shot multi; another week, someone else might spread bets across five races. Without agreed rules, the club's bankroll can whittle away. Many experienced punters clubs establish ground rules to impose discipline. For instance, a common guideline is to limit the number of bets placed in a week ²⁰ – this prevents the club's fund from being frittered on too many bets. Another typical rule: no ultra-low-odds “bankers” in multis ²⁰. This refers to the practice of adding a $1.05 odds leg to a multi (parlay) just to slightly boost the potential payout; clubs forbid it because if that leg fails (and surprises do happen), the whole multi is ruined for almost no gain (and such short legs hardly add value anyway). Some clubs also say “no obscure sports” or long-range futures bets – meaning, don't tie up the club's money on a bet that won't be decided for months or on a sport nobody follows. Essentially, these rules are about managing risk and focus.

Another aspect is bankroll management. A punters club should decide how to allocate the weekly kitty: do you bet the entire pool each week, or just a portion and carry over some reserve? Some clubs allow the weekly punter (the member whose turn it is) to bet, say, half the pool and save half, to mitigate complete busts. Others have a rule that if someone has a collect above a certain amount, a portion of profits is banked (set aside) rather than re-bet, ensuring the club gradually builds a profit over time. There's also often a rule about what happens if someone wins: for example, if you get a winning bet on your week, you might get another turn ²¹. This incentivizes good betting. On the flip side, transparency is important – keeping records of all bets and balances prevents any distrust (and of course, “don't let someone steal the money” is an unwritten yet vital rule as one forum quipped ²²!).

Punters clubs also love the social aspect, which can influence the betting strategy. Because it's more fun to cheer a big odds multi or a quaddie, clubs often gravitate towards exotic bets for the thrill and large potential payouts. This can be a double-edged sword: as noted, many punters see exotics as “a chance to make a windfall collect, far more attractive than grinding out a small profit with win and place bets.” ²³ That describes the mentality in many punters clubs – go for a big hit that could pay for a group trip or a massive end-of-year party. The problem is, chasing big wins can lead to big losses. If every week the club swings for the fences with long-shot bets, the pool can deplete quickly unless a big win comes early. Statistics often aren't kind to these bets (more on exotics below), so without careful strategy the club could bust. Indeed, legendary racing author Don Scott once observed that “betting for a win and place, [punters] lose moderately. Betting exotically, they lose on a grand scale,” because exotic betting multiplies any errors in judgment ²⁴.

This is a cautionary point for punters clubs: the allure of exotics must be balanced with smart selections, or the club will likely go broke faster than if they stuck to simpler bets.

Integrating Betfair into a punters club can be an interesting angle. While traditionally a club might just bet through the TAB (especially when meeting at a pub), nothing stops the group from using Betfair for better odds on straightforward bets or to hedge. For example, suppose it's your turn to bet for the club and you fancy a horse at $4.00 odds. On Betfair the same horse might be $4.50 – by placing the bet on Betfair you'd get more return for the club if it wins (after commission). Or, if the club has a large stake on a horse and it shortens in-run, one could lay it on Betfair to lock in some profit – essentially applying a trading move to secure the club a return no matter what. However, doing this in a group setting can be complex to manage (and Betfair trading might not be well-understood by all members). Some clubs solve this by having a designated “professional” in charge of placing bets optimally (e.g., using Betfair vs tote depending on value). But if the club is more for fun, everyone might just agree to keep it simple and stick to the local TAB for ease.

In summary, a punters club should establish clear guidelines to handle the “problem” of group betting chaos. Setting limits, choosing bet types wisely, and possibly leveraging better odds through exchanges are ways to improve the club's chances of success. The club should also decide its objectives: is it to steadily grow the bankroll or to take a shot at a life-changing win? If it's the latter, expect a volatile ride. If it's the former, a more disciplined, data-driven approach (perhaps using Betfair data to guide bets) will be needed – essentially running the club almost like a mini betting syndicate rather than a casual flutter group.

Exotic Bets: High Risk, High Reward

When the user mentions “the exotic stuff is where to make the money,” they're referring to those complex bets – multis, exactas, trifectas, First4s, quadrellas, etc. – that offer high payouts compared to stake. Exotic bets require predicting multiple outcomes correctly, such as the first 2, 3, or 4 horses in order (or in any order, depending on the bet type), or stringing together winners of consecutive races (multi-legs like doubles, trebles, quaddies). The reason people see exotics as lucrative is straightforward: the odds of hitting them are low, so the payouts are correspondingly large, often many times your stake. A $10 bet on a well-picked trifecta could return thousands of dollars. This is why, as noted, the average punter is attracted to exotics as a chance at a windfall, rather than the slow grind of regular win betting ²³. In punters clubs, a successful exotic bet can massively boost the club bankroll overnight – hence the temptation.

However, exotic bets come with significant risk and usually a higher house edge. Most exotics are offered through the tote pools. The takeout (the percentage the house takes) on exotics is often higher than on simple win bets – for example, trifectas and First4s might have around 20% takeout in many Australian totes. This means, in the long run, punters are collectively losing 20% on these bets (compared to maybe 14-16% on win bets). Don Scott's critique highlights that unskilled punters multiply their losses with exotics ²⁴. If a bettor doesn't have a systematic approach, throwing darts at exotics will drain money faster. Picking one correct combination in a trifecta out of hundreds of possible combinations is a tough task, akin to lottery odds if done randomly.

On the flip side, for a skilled or astute punter, exotics can indeed be where the money is. The key is that many people do bet them haphazardly (boxing large fields, picking favorite as a banker with “field” etc.), which often leads to over-betting on certain obvious combinations and under-betting on others. A knowledgeable bettor who can accurately assess true probabilities might find “value” in exotic pools – combos that should be paying $500 but end up paying $1000 because the pool neglected them. As the betting writer Martin Dowling noted, “the vast majority of your punting counterparts is betting incorrectly... This is where astute punters move in and cash in.” ²⁵ Professionals approach exotics methodically: they might calculate their own odds for exacta or trifecta combinations using models or by aggregating win probabilities from Betfair. They then only bet those combinations if the projected dividend (based on pool estimates) is higher than their calculated fair price – classic value betting applied to exotics. One famous approach by Don Scott was to determine a “true price” for each horse and construct quinella/trifecta bets focusing only on value combinations, avoiding the “mug punter” habit of including too many low-value horses or random longshots without reasoning ²⁶. He stressed eliminating bad value runners (favorites that are under the odds or rank outsiders with almost no hope) and concentrating combinations among horses that are genuinely overlooked in pricing ²⁶. This kind of disciplined approach can indeed make exotics profitable, but it requires expertise and effort – essentially treating exotics like a math problem to be solved, rather than a lottery ticket.

For the everyday punter or punters club, a few practical tips for exotic betting emerge from expert strategies:

- Be selective in your races: Choose races where you have an edge in knowledge or where the favorites look vulnerable (so the exotic payout could be juicy if you’re right). If you can confidently eliminate a popular horse from the top slots, you gain a big advantage in trifectas or First4s because many others will include that horse.
- Structure bets wisely: Instead of boxing a large number of horses (which gets expensive and often includes combinations you don’t actually believe in), focus on a key selection (banker) and a few secondary picks. For example, in a trifecta you might take one horse to win, with 3-4 others to run second and third (in combinations), rather than taking “field” for third. You can also do multiple tickets weighting your stronger opinions with higher percentages (using flexi-betting). The goal is to invest more in the combinations you feel are most likely, and less (or nothing) in those that are just hopeful.
- Consider the cost vs reward: Exotic bets allow flexi betting on most totes now – meaning you can take a percentage of the full dividend for a smaller stake. This is useful for punters clubs: you can take a 5% quaddie for example, which costs less but still returns 5% of the whopping dividend if you hit it. It can stretch your bankroll while keeping you in the game for the big payout.
- Use data to your advantage: Here’s where Betfair data can help even with exotics. The win odds on Betfair for each runner can be used to derive approximate probabilities of various outcomes. Some advanced punters calculate the “fair” trifecta dividends from win odds (or even use Betfair’s Exacta market as a reference for Quinella probabilities, etc.) and compare that to the tote will-pays. If, say, a certain trifecta combination is paying much higher on the tote than it “should” based on those odds, that’s a value bet. This kind of analysis might be beyond casual clubs, but even a basic check like “the favorite is drifting on Betfair, maybe we shouldn’t bank it in our exotic” can save you from following the crowd.

It’s worth noting that Betfair itself has begun offering some exotic markets on the exchange in recent years. As of August 21, 2023, Betfair Exchange introduced Exacta and Quinella markets on all Australian horse and greyhound races ²⁷. On these exchange exotic markets, you can back or lay combinations (for example, back a specific Exacta combination of two horses to finish 1-2 in order, or lay it if you think that combo won’t happen) ²⁸. This is a significant development because traditionally exotics were only via tote. The exchange exotics allow you to effectively set your own odds or take someone else’s offered odds on, say, a quinella. The liquidity on these markets might not be very high yet (since it’s a new feature), but it offers an interesting alternative: potentially better pricing and the ability to trade exotics (e.g., you could back an exacta combination and then lay it at a shorter price if its likelihood increases mid-race for in-play races, though in-play exacta markets are probably very risky). For now, more complex exotics like trifectas or First4s are not available on Betfair exchange – so the tote is the place for those. Betfair Multiples (their term for accumulator bets) do exist but those are essentially like a bookmaker product using the exchange odds for each leg; they allow 2 to 8 leg multis ²⁹, but these are less commonly used than the tote exotics in a social setting.

So, is the exotic stuff really “where to make the money”? The answer is yes and no. Yes, exotics are where you can turn a small stake into a huge return, and skillful bettors can exploit inefficiencies for profit. But for most punters, exotics are a high-risk gamble that often leads to losing money faster than simple bets. They should be approached with caution and strategy. For a punters club, a reasonable approach might be to allocate a portion of the bankroll to exotic bets (for the moon-shot win), while using the rest on more straightforward bets (or even a trading strategy) to sustain the bankroll. This way, you have some tickets in the big lottery, but you’re also not relying solely on miracles each week.

Finding the Most Effective Strategy

Ultimately, the most effective betting strategy will depend on your goals and resources. If you are looking for steady, sustainable growth of a bankroll (such as a long-term profitable punters club), a data-driven approach focusing on value bets and possibly Betfair trading is likely to outperform pure exotic betting. Using Betfair’s data to find value opportunities – whether that’s a horse that should be $3.00 but is $4.00 on the exchange, or a football team that you can lay at lower odds than their true chance – will, over time, yield a positive return if done consistently and intelligently. The exchange’s better odds and ability to lay bets let you act as the bookmaker when a price is “wrong,” effectively giving you an edge. This approach requires homework: analyzing form, monitoring markets, maybe even writing models to predict outcomes. It’s not as flashy as hitting a 100-1 multi, but the edge you gain compounds over many bets.

Betfair trading can be a part of this effective strategy as well. A skilled trader might make a few ticks profit on dozens of races in a day – each gain is small, but added together they can produce a solid income. Trading also has the benefit of limiting risk if you’re disciplined: you enter and exit positions, rather than risking a full stake on a win/lose outcome. For example, instead of betting $100 on a horse to win (and either doubling your money or losing it all), a trader might use $100 liability to back-then-lay (or vice versa) and lock in, say, a $10 profit regardless of who wins the race. It’s a different mindset, more akin to investing. For someone serious about making consistent money from betting, these techniques are usually more effective than swing-for-the-fences bets. As the saying goes in professional punting, “grind out the profit” rather than trying to triple your bank in one go.

On the other hand, if the goal is to have fun and maybe strike it rich, exotics are the vehicle for that. A punters club that’s more about entertainment might accept that they’ll probably lose most weeks, in exchange for the excitement of the occasional big collect. There’s nothing wrong with that approach as long as everyone is aware (and only betting money they can afford to lose). In that scenario, effectiveness might be measured not just in ROI but in enjoyment and camaraderie. Still, even fun-focused clubs can improve their results by incorporating some smart tactics: for instance, use Betfair data to avoid terrible value bets (if a horse is $10 on Betfair but paying $5 on the tote for a place, it’s likely a poor bet on the tote). Or set rules like those “golden rules” to prevent the most common errors (like over-betting, chasing losses, or betting on things nobody has researched).

In an ideal world, one could combine both approaches: allocate a portion of funds to “safe” bets or trades that grind out profit, and another portion to “exotic” bets that, if won, give a huge boost. For example, a club might use 70% of its weekly funds on a couple of smart win/place bets or a trading strategy (perhaps identified via careful study or tips from a trusted source), and 30% on a quaddie or trifecta for fun. The small wins from the 70% portion could keep the bankroll from dying out, while the 30% is the lottery ticket. Over time, the data-driven bets might even slowly grow the bankroll, so the club stays in the game long enough to hit an exotic. This balanced approach addresses both the psychology (keeping it fun) and the economics (maintaining an edge).

To conclude, Betfair provides a rich dataset and platform for improving betting outcomes, whether through obtaining better odds, enabling trading strategies, or informing value betting decisions. Punters clubs can benefit from this by making more informed bets and not just punting blind. Exotic bets, especially in the Australian betting scene, do offer a path to big money, but they should be engaged with using sound strategy and realistic expectations. The most effective way to “make the money” is likely a combination of discipline and savvy: use data (from Betfair and elsewhere) to guide your betting, choose the right betting medium (exchange vs TAB) for the situation to maximize value, and only take the high-risk exotic shots when you’ve identified a real opportunity (or you’re comfortable with the long odds for the sake of excitement). With this approach, you can enjoy the best of both worlds – the analytical edge of Betfair trading and the adrenaline of the occasional big bet at the pub – all while improving your chances of coming out ahead in the long run.

References and Sources

- Betfair Developer Program – Betfair Historical Data service description ¹
 - Honest Betting Reviews – Introduction to Betfair Trading (concept overview) ¹¹
 - HorseRacingInfo.com.au – Betfair vs TAB comparison (better odds and exchange features) ¹⁷ ¹²
 - Betfair Hub (Australia) – Announcement of Exotic markets (Exacta, Quinella) on Betfair Exchange ²⁷
 - Practical Punting – Discussion of exotic betting appeal and pitfalls ²³ ²⁴
 - Practical Punting – Expert insight on punters betting incorrectly on exotics and value approach ²⁵ ²⁶
-

- 1 7 8 16 What data is provided by the Historical Data service? – Betfair Developer Program
<https://support.developer.betfair.com/hc/en-us/articles/360002407732-What-data-is-provided-by-the-Historical-Data-service>
- 2 3 4 5 What Betfair Exchange market data is available from listMarketBook & Stream API? – Betfair Developer Program
<https://support.developer.betfair.com/hc/en-us/articles/6540502258077-What-Betfair-Exchange-market-data-is-available-from-listMarketBook-Stream-API>
- 6 Betting at the Betfair Starting Price (SP)
<https://www.betfair.com/help/Help.SP.Betting/>
- 9 10 12 17 29 Betfair Review | Better Odds than the TAB
<https://www.horseracinginfo.com.au/betfair-betting-exchange-review.htm>
- 11 13 14 15 Top Six Betfair Trading Strategies for 2025 - Tried and Tested
<https://www.honestbettingreviews.com/betfair-trading-strategies/>
- 18 Betfair: Betting Review - The Roar
<https://www.theroar.com.au/betfair-betting-review/>
- 19 23 24 25 26 Staking your way to success EVEN UP THE EXOTICS
<https://practicalpunting.com.au/pp-online/a-z-of-betting/exotic-betting/range-of-exotics/even-up-the-exotics-20110922>
- 20 9 golden rules for any punters club
<https://www.punters.com.au/news/9-golden-rules-for-any-punters-club--20161009>
- 21 22 Punters Club Rules | BigFooty Forum
<https://www.bigfooty.com/forum/threads/punters-club-rules.1190747/>
- 27 28 HOW TO: PLAYING THE EXOTICS - Betfair Hub
<https://www.betfair.com.au/hub/education/how-to-playing-the-exotics/>